Hoe (Korean-style Sashimi)

Due to the mixture of warm and cold currents, Busan's coastal seas have always been rich in marine resources. The fish living in rough currents have a lot of activity, resulting in their solid flesh. Busan-style hoe is prepared from freshly caught fish, which has a pleasant texture and a slightly sweet flavor.

Braised Monkfish

The braised monkfish in Busan has a distinct flavor differentiated from other regions, made of fresh raw monkfish, bean sprouts, natural seafood seasoning, and flavored soup. It is characterized by the use of fine red pepper powder to reduce the spiciness while having an appetizing color. By adding starch, the nutrients in the soup are fully absorbed when eaten.

Braised Crucian Carp

Beloved as a nutritional food in Korea for ages, the crucian carp is high in protein and iron, which is good for anemia. Located at the mouth of the Nakdong River, Busan locals have long been enjoying braised crucian carp with many reservoirs that have provided a rich supply of fish. However, as fishing in the Nakdong River decreased and the supply from the Oryun reservoir is relatively low, crucian carp dishes are becoming increasingly rare to find.

Eel

The Gijang area of Busan is the main production center of conger eel. Many specialty restaurants are also located in this region. Since there is not much difference in taste throughout the year, eel dishes are always in demand. Most of them are eaten as hoe or grilled. The bones are fried and enjoyed as snacks, and the head and intestines become ingredients for soup.
